The President's Message

I think we can now say... Spring is here! If it's after "Mother's Day", we can assume it is safe to put our tomato plants out, at least that is what my Grandfather always told me and I guess we could say that goes for orchids too. I hang my orchids in wire baskets on my dogwood tree and on a shaded fence. Just to be sure the ants don't take up residence, I stick an ant bait spike in the pots. By the way, hanging wire baskets are a great deal at the Dollar Tree store if you go early in the season. When I first started raising orchids, I put my Phals outside. They got sunburned even though they were in shade...that was a heart-breaking lesson. Now I keep them inside, spreading them out to fill the space left by my plants that escape to the outside and everyone is happy!

Our May Speaker Bert Akitake Growing Vanilla Plants

Our speaker this month is Bert K. Akitake, MD. Bert is currently the president of the Maui Orchid Society, and has been their president for the past five years. He often speaks to Maui groups and meetings about growing orchids in general and also in the growing of vanilla. He is not a commercial grower, but an enthusiast who has become particularly interested in vanilla culture. He grows his orchid plants around his home in Wailuku, Hawaii, where the warm weather is very favorable to growing orchids outside.

He has been an orchid enthusiast for over 20 years, and actively growing orchids for 15 years. Approximately 10 years ago he began growing vanilla when he happened upon a gentlemen who was selling vanilla cuttings at the local swap meet. Since that time he has learned many vagaries that can happen when growing the vanilla pod. He became successful, and was able to understand the processing and production of Vanilla pods that are acceptable for sale.

His presentation will be from a grower's prospective to vanilla culture, with emphasis on practical tips associated with vanilla care.

April, 2018 Judges' Choice

Paph.
Johanna Burkhardt
Rothschildianum

Hybrid vigor is the genetic resilience to be gained by crossing unrelated plants of the same species, but of different varieties, that result in an increase in genetic diversity or fitness. Practiced in agriculture for thousands of years, this technique can produce enhanced plants and animals for show purposes. Accordingly, the cross of Paph. Johanna Burkhardt (Rothschildianum X Antitum) back to Paph, Rothschildianum may produce a more vigorous plant with larger and darker blooms than either parent possesses.

Last summer I purchased a couple of five leaf seedlings of this cross from Sophie's Orchids via Amazon that showed the beginnings of second growths. With one of them I was able to demonstrate hybrid vigor on the April MOS show table. My usual slipper orchid culture technique is to immediately sprinkle about a quarter teaspoon of powdered cinnamon (a mild antiseptic) about the base of the plant and repeat every 4 or 5 months. I water with Baltimore City tap water every other day from the top down until there is gentle seepage out of the bottom of the pot. Once a month the watering is with 20-20-20 fertilizer at one fourth strength. Leaves that begin to yellow are pruned at the base to retard possible infection. I repot whenever the medium becomes too hardened to allow water to immediately flow through and/or when medium is pushed up due to root crowding within the pot. The second of the two seedlings was repotted later and has yet to spike. Recently, this cross is being referred to as "Paph. Paradise".

Want to Grow Native Orchids?

Despite their cold and heat tolerance, despite their living in our region, native orchids are not always the most garden-friendly plants

Often they may have very specific habitat requirements that are hard to match in our gardens.

Here are three which have proven fairly durable:

1. Large Yellow Ladyslipper (Cypripedium pubescens) and its hybrid. These do well in an open shade wildflower garden. If you can grow Trilliums, Bloodroot, or Solomon's Sea chances are you can grow Cypripedium pubescens.
2. Ladies Tresses (Spirantes odorate "Chadd Ford"). This clone is so widespread that many people don't know its an orchid. Likes wet feet, such as the edge of a water garden or stream. As long as adequate moisture is guaranteed, it can take up to full sun. Makes a spectacular specimen.
3. Grass Pink (Calopogon tuberosus). If you grow carnivorous plants, stick a few of these in with them. They are reliable and if happy, will self-seed.

David's Corner

For the May education corner, I'm going to consider a topic that needs to be refreshed every year: grooming, staking, and labeling show table plants.

The show table is possibly the most important aspect of our meetings, after the main program. However, without going into detail, there are times when it is the most important. Every member, from their first novice exhibit to the most experienced, feels good after a plant receives a ribbon, especially a blue ribbon.

In this Education Corner, I want to help all members strive towards blue ribbons. How?

1. Start by exhibiting your very best plant or plants.
2. To be continued in the Education Corner!
